The optimist believes that problems are temporary and will get better. By contrast, the pessimist is convinced that the problem is here to stay and can only get worse. In the cases above, both optimist and pessimist believe that their view of the glass is correct. The pessimist would predict that, once the glass is empty, there will be no water available to replace it.

The optimist believes (for example) that events will turn out for the best, or that people are trustworthy. Most people are generally optimistic about things that have turned out well for them in the past, or about things that have good associations for them. People can also be optimistic about their internal lives and still pessimistic about external world events.
